Satellites do not exist in isolation. A satellite is defined by its relationship with the object that it orbits. Sometimes the two are engaged in a direct exchange, like a television satellite in space sending signals to a satellite dish on earth or a satellite town sending commuters into the city. Sometimes they don't stay in such close contact. There is always a relationship between them.

An artwork, on being completed and leaving the artist's studio, is endowed with its own power and life. But, like a satellite, it remains just within the artist's gravitational pull. It cannot exist without reference to its creator.

In this exhibition, ten large-scale works in their respective artists' signature styles are hung alongside ten "satellite" pieces. The pairs all differ in scale and many also do in colour, subject, medium and style. Hung together, they engage in a dialogue where each work counterpoints the other. The result is a complex web that extends beyond the gallery space: relationships between each artist and their artworks and between the artworks themselves.
